WHITECAPISM BREAKS OUT.

Blacksmith Finds Bundle of Switches and Note of Warning.

Special to the Indianapolis Journal. KOKOMO, Ind., Aug. 28.-Whitecapism has broken out in this section of the State. Yesterday when Charles Reynolds, the village blacksmith, returned home he found a bundle of hickory switches at his door, with a note signed "Citizens of Alto," warning Reynolds to treat his wife better. Later in the day Reynolds met Nathaniel Miller, postmaster and merchant, and accused him. Miller threw a two-pound scale weight at Reynolds and drew a revolver. Reynolds retreated to his buggy and got a double barreled shotgun. The villagers rushed between them and no harm was done. Reynolds, whose wife recently left him, has armed his residence and bloodshed will follow any attempt of the "Cappers" to carry out their threats.

He suffered a heavy fall, but came back to this city unaided on local train which left Coatsville shortly after the accident. Mr. Weik remembers nothing of the accident. It is thought by his physician that he will recover.

A peculiar part of the accident was the actions of a stranger going by the name of Ziggler, who has been in this city for a week. He has been in consultation with the officers here at different times, and is believed to be a secret service or government detective. He was on the same train as Weik going to Indianapolis. "About this time of the year in 1896, just before the election of that year, affairs were in a very bad condition. Money was scarce and rates high, the New York banks were discussing the advisability of issuing clearing house certificates, and gold was going out in large and alarming quantities, The government was on the eve of a bond about this time, the banks and bankers came to the rescue, and by manipulating the sterling exchange market stopped gold exports and imported large amounts from sylvania on Saturday made the run be- | Europe. This steaded the market; but uncertainty and doubt continued up to the election, when confidence was restored by the defeat of Mr. Bryan.

"The most careless observer of contemporaneous events must realize the wonderfu advancement made by our country recent years, not only in wealth and all that goes to make up a great and prosperous nation, but particularly in prestige and position among nations. Looking back to the period of 1890 to 1893, we will remember that not only did the United States not hold a commanding position among nations, but we were at that time suffering from distrust and depression, attributable to unwise currency laws and the adoption of a financial system at variance with the accepted principles of solvent and prosperous nations. At the close of the Harrison administration the operations of the currency laws of 1878 and 1890 had produced a state of affairs so alarming as to destroy confidence. Europe was sending home our securities to the value of hundreds of millions of dollars, and was withdrawing its capital from this country, fearing the inability of the government, under the great and accumulating load of silver, to maintain our currency upon a parity with gold business was greatly depressed, and the employes of the company that those who revenues of the government were so reduced that a deficiency was inevitable. We may say, in passing, that Senator Sherman himself contributed largely to the action of the Senate in repealing this act, and that, in the final vote, although a Democratic measure, there were more Republican than Democratic votes in favor of the repeal of the bill. All through Mr. Cleveland's administration his party associates, many of them the same who voted for the repeal of the Sherman opposed all efforts of Mr. Cleveland to maintain the gold reserve.
